Charles Ray in "Scrap Iron," at the Grand

To be the feature at the Grand Saturday is the splendid six-reel production produced under direction of that clever star performer, Charles Ray, who is as popular as he is attractive. The title of the play, "Scrap Iron," will give a hint as to the character of the production.

John Steel, mill hand and amateur boxer, lives in a western city. Midge Flannigan is his girl. His chief sorrow is the ill health of his mother. He studies incessantly with the hope of getting a position yielding enough money to enable him to take his mother to a healthier climate. His mother dislikes boxing and he gives it up at her request. His fellow workers think he is a coward and christen him "Scrap Iron." At a picnic he refuses to hit Bill Dugan, when the latter, who is drunk, annoys Midge. Battling Burke, a professional fighter, knocks Dugan down. Midge deserts John and accepts Burke's attentions. John loses his job. He goes broke and accepts an offer from the manager of a local fight club to meet Burke. He lasts three rounds. John gets $200, if not, he receives nothing for his pains. John enters the ring with the sole idea of staying the three rounds. He is given a severe beating, but is still fighting when the third round ends. In the fourth Burke goes in to finish his man. John, now that his $200 is safe, fights back furiously and knocks the professional out. The club manager adds a winner's end to the $200. John goes home to find that his mother has had another bad attack. Midge comes to him, repentant, but John's whole soul is now wrapped up in his mother, when he intends to take on a trip that will restore her to health.

One receiving set that has difficulty in catching everything broadcast is an ash tray.
